

CHEESE FROM SPAIN AWARDS 2026

Foods & Wines from Spain

April 2026

Introduction

Cheese production has traditionally served as the main method for preserving milk. The more than 200 varieties of cheese currently found in Spain are part of the historical heritage shaped by the diverse civilizations that have inhabited its lands over time. For the Romans, cheese was an essential supplement to their staple diet of cereals and vegetables, and a practical, nourishing food for both farmers and soldiers due to its ease of transportation.

The immense diversity of Spanish cheeses is closely linked to the country's geographical and climatic variety. These cheeses are made using cow, sheep, and goat milk—often from indigenous breeds—and sometimes with mixtures of all three. Coagulation can be achieved through enzymatic processes, lactic fermentation, or a combination of both. Cheeses vary in shape—round or square—as well as in size and rind appearance, which may be engraved, smoked, rubbed with oil, or seasoned with spices. Alongside industrial-scale production, artisanal dairies continue to craft traditional cheeses that preserve their original flavors and characteristics.

Sheep's milk cheese from Spain

Sheep are considered one of the most emblematic livestock species in Spain. They are primarily found on the Castilian plains of central and southwestern Spain, where pastures are plentiful in winter and spring. Among the most notable native breeds are Churro, Merino, Castellano, and Manchego, originally bred for wool but now primarily valued for milk used in cheese production. Some of Spain's most famous cheeses made from sheep's milk include Manchego, Zamorano, Torta de la Serena, and Torta del Casar—all of which have Protected Designation of Origin (PDO) recognition.

In the northern mountainous regions, particularly in the Basque Country and Navarre, two additional PDO sheep's cheeses stand out: Idiazabal and Roncal. These are made from rare native breeds such as Latxa and Carranzana (Idiazabal), and Latxa and Rasa Aragonesa (Roncal).

Northern Spanish cow's milk cheeses

The rainy and mountainous northern fringe of Spain, which stretches along the coast and is separated from the interior by the Picos de Europa, Montes de Galicia, and Pyrenees, is a rich area for pasture and grazing. More than 15 native cattle breeds thrive here, perfectly adapted to their natural environment. The isolation of many areas has led to an extraordinary variety of cheese types. In Asturias alone, there are over twenty different varieties. Numerous northern cow's milk cheeses have PDO status, including Tetilla in Galicia and L'Alt Urgell and La Cerdanya in Catalonia. Additionally, Mahón-Menorca, a cow's milk cheese from the island of Menorca, also enjoys PDO protection.

Butter is another emblematic product of northern Spain. Some varieties, such as Mantequilla de Soria and those from L'Alt Urgell and La Cerdanya, are also covered by PDO certification.

Goat cheese from Spain

Goats are well-suited to environments that are unsuitable for other livestock, thriving on sparse pastures and rugged landscapes. In Spain, they are mostly raised along the Mediterranean coast, in the Andalusian mountains, and in certain areas of Extremadura. Various native breeds and crossbreeds are used. Two PDO goat cheeses include Ibores, produced in the Extremaduran region of the same name from Retinta goat's milk, and Murcia al Vino, made with Murcian goat milk and bathed in red wine. The Canary Islands are home to two more PDO-protected goat cheeses: Palmero (La Palma) and Majorero (Fuerteventura). Both are similar in style, although Palmero cheeses are often smoked.

Mixed-milk cheeses from Spain

All three types of milk are produced almost year-round in Spain, and mixed herds are common. Consequently, many cheeses—particularly those from central Spain—are made from a blend of cow, goat, and sheep milk. These cheeses, often cylindrical in shape, dominate both production and consumption in the country. Ibérico is the most widely known and consumed mixed-milk cheese. It is mild but distinctive in flavor, combining acidity from the cow's milk, a subtle sharpness from the goat's milk, and buttery richness from the sheep's milk.

The Picos de Europa mountain range, straddling the regions of Cantabria, Asturias, and Castile-León, is home to a number of soft, blue-veined cheeses. The area's natural caves provide ideal conditions—humidity and cool air—for the development of molds that gradually penetrate the cheese, creating its iconic blue veins. The most famous of these is PDO Cabrales, made in Asturias using raw cow's milk, and sometimes blended with goat's or sheep's milk during the spring and summer. Other notable examples are PDO Picón Bejes-Tresviso and PDO Valdeón, produced respectively in the Cantabrian and Leonese sections of the range.
